Learning with Khaki: Jamia police station library takes digital avatar

Sidhartha Roy@timesgroup.com

New Delhi: If a student is looking for a quiet place for a few hours of peaceful studying, what would be the right place to head to? For a student living in South Delhi's Jamia Nagar, the answer would be the nearest police station.

Started in 2012, the 'Police Public Library' at Jamia Nagar police station is arguably the country's first that arms visitors with books. Set up to remove a common citizen's fear of a police station, this unique initiative of Delhi Police is being successfully managed by an NGO, Shikhar Organisation for Social Development.

The library was recently revamped into 'Delhi Police Digital Library' with financial support from power discom BSES Rajdhani Power Limited (BRPL). The cost of running the digital library

WORD MATTERS: Delhi Police has been running a public library at Jamia Nagar Police Station for nine years including that of educational material, maintenance and salaries, is being borne by BRPL through its CSR programmes.

Mehjabeen Shabnam, a teacher, couldn't believe her ears when she first heard about the library. "At first, my parents didn't agree and even I had some hesitation about going to study among policemen," said the 20-something Jamia Nagar resident. "However, when I visited the library, the atmosphere there was safe and more girls came there," she added.

Devesh Chandra Srivastava, special commissioner, who was the joint commissioner of police (southern range), when this initiative was mooted, said Delhi Police was a pioneer when it came to such community initiatives.

"One of the things we did to bring the student community closer to us was starting this library at Jamia Nagar. Then we got another at RK Puram and a third one at Okhla Vihar Metro police station," said Srivastava, adding that such initiatives smoothen the relation between police and public.

Srivastava added, "BSES is sponsorsoring us in the smooth running of this library. The discom has also supported Delhi Police Public Library by setting up smart classrooms."

"Our CSR programmes maintain a symbiotic relationship with the society as we live and work in perfect harmony with the communities around us. We look for unique opportunities and work with like-minded partners to bring about positive changes in the society," BSES said in a statement.

The senior IPS officer said, "We also run coaching classes in association with educators and provide books and journals." He added that apart from senior IPS officers like himself, other senior civil servants were also called to teach students, including an IRS officer who provides regular coaching.

The library provides facilities like study materials, Wi-Fi, laptops, Nadeem Akhtar, director of the library, said the idea was to provide coaching facilities to students who might not be able to afford it otherwise. "Initially, it was difficult to encourage parents from the nearby locality to send their children here. However, over time many girls and boys started coming here after finding out for themselves how safe the environment was," he added.
